Expert Witness Report of Kirk Torgensen
In the matter of Josh Chatwin v. Draper City et al.

I. Statement of Assignment

I have been retained to perform a review of the Draper City policies and procedures and training with respect to use of force issues. My opinions expressed herein are based upon review of the material summarized herein in section III. My firm is being compensated at the rate of $150 per hour for all tasks performed in connection with this matter. I have not testified as an expert in any case prior to this case. I have not published any articles.

II. Background and qualifications

I have a law degree from the University of Utah and became a member of the bar in 1986. I went into the United State Air Force in 1986 as a Judge Advocate General and remained for four years. In 1990 I Joined the Utah Attorney General Office as an Assistant Attorney General. In 1991 I became the section Chief of the Civil Rights section and remained in that position for several years. I left the AG office in 1998 to become the Director of Adult Probation and Parole. After 3 years in this position I was appointed the Chief Deputy Attorney General a position I held for 13 years. I am currently working for Private OPS a local private investigation firm in Salt Lake City.

I have been asked to review the policy and procedures for Draper City PD on the use of force and training provided by the department in 2010 at the date prior to the incident in question in this case. My background and experience allows me to review these issues as I have spent over 23 years teaching police officers and criminal justice students about the constitutional and statutory requirements associated with the use of force. In 1990 I began teaching at the Utah Police Academy and I taught the legal curriculum to basic cadets trying to become certified as police officers. This was a 40 hour legal block that included the legal issues surrounding the use of force. We discussed the constitutional issues and the case law that gives guidance as to how the use of force would be viewed by courts and juries to determine if it was reasonable. I taught this curriculum on average at least 5 to 6 times a year. This included also teaching within the Advanced Officer training program. This included officers who were already certified and had been police officers for years. This training was certified by the Police Academy and was part of the 40 hours officers are required to complete each year to maintain their certification. I also provided similar training to departments upon their request.

Over the 23 years of providing this training I spent hundreds of hours and taught thousands of officers on these issues. I also taught as an adjunct professor for Weber State University in their Criminal Justice program. I taught there for 24 years and in that capacity I also taught the constitutional and statutory issues associated with a police officers use of force. We reviewed case law and examined all the factors a court would look at to determine if the force used was constitutionally acceptable. Over the 24 years at Weber State I taught well over a thousand students on these issues.

As a police academy certified instructor and adjunct professor I also taught officers and students about the use of policy and procedure, and its importance in guiding officers on important legal standards and how to comport with those standards. I explained the need for policy and procedure to be straight forward and simple, but also to be thorough enough that it could guide a relative inexperienced officer in what was expected of them and how to meet those expectations. We discussed how critical solid policy is in protecting against liability and how critical it is to train officers with respect to the policy and the issues involved.

As the Chief Deputy Attorney General for 13 years I had responsibility to create policy and procedure office wide, which included policy and procedure for the 30 plus sworn officers in the office. I reviewed policy for adequacy and approved policies as part of the office policy manual. This included use of force policy and procedure for the sworn officers and associated training on that policy. I also was responsible to review use of force complaints and issues and discipline officers if they violated the policy or did not meet the expected standard. I did this for the entire 13 years I was the Chief Deputy.

In addition, in August 2011 I was awarded a contract with a partner to provide Federal court ordered training to the entire Atlanta Georgia police department. This training was mandated by the Federal court as a result of losing a civil rights lawsuit. The training was on the fourth amendment and focused heavily on search and seizure constitutional issues as well as training on the departments policy and procedure and the necessity to know and follow policy and procedure. Over 2000 officers had to receive four hours training on these issues. I spent several weeks providing this training.

III. Opinions, Basis and Reasons for Opinions

After reviewing all the material stated herein it is my opinion that the Draper policy in place at the time of this incident on May 18, 2010 was extremely inadequate and did not provide sufficient guidance and direction on the constitutional and statutory issues that an officer faces in use of force situations. The policy is completely lacking in any concrete guidance on the factors to consider to determine if the use of force was reasonable as dictated by the Constitution and Utah state statutes. Furthermore, there is no evidence of any training provided to Officer Patterson by the department as there are no training records. Also Officer Patterson admits in his deposition that he could not recall receiving any such training.

The 2010 use of force policy in place at the time of this incident simply cites the Utah state statute which states that force may be used which is reasonably believed to be necessary to affect an arrest. In other words, the officers are told simply to use force that is reasonable. This type of conclusory statement is of little or no help to officers. There is nothing within the policy that helps an officer analyze and dissect what factors should be considered in deciding if any particular use of force is reasonable under the circumstances. This coupled with the fact that Draper PD did not produce any evidence of any training provided to Officer Patterson since joining the force and Patterson's own admission that he could not recall receiving any such training shows a lack of attention to the department's legal obligations. The department, in my opinion, was woefully inadequate in having sufficient policy and procedure, and associated training, to assure officers would meet their legal obligations. The basis and the reasons for my opinion are as follows: The 2010 policy is nothing more than a cite to the state statute that says the force used must be reasonable. This statement provides no clear guidance or instruction on how to determine what use of force is reasonable. It does not provide any factors to consider or any concrete guidelines on how to ascertain the amount of force that would be reasonable. It is merely a statement that states the standard without any factors or guidance on how to meet that standard.

Having a comprehensive and thorough policy is only the first step in assuring that an officer is prepared to only use the force that is reasonable. Training is an absolute critical component. An officer must be trained thoroughly on how to deal with situations and circumstances in a reasonable way so when confronted with that situation their training helps them react appropriately. An officer will react according to their training if that training has been conducted appropriately and with sufficient repetition. That is why on-going training on such situations and appropriate responses is critical. In this case, Draper PD has not provided much, if any evidence, of any such training.

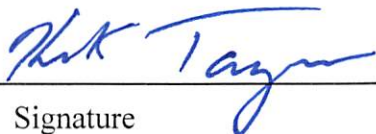

I also reviewed the 2013 policy adopted by Draper PD and compared it to the 2010 policy. The 2013 policy is a much more comprehensive policy. For example this policy covers critical topics like the fact the officer cannot be the aggressor and it importantly lists factors to be considered in determining if the force is reasonable. Factors listed are (a) through (q) and contain factors like the effects of drugs and alcohol and the subject's mental state or capacity. Also the degree to which the subject has been effectively restrained and their ability to resist must be factored in to the situation. All of these issues end up being critical issues in the incident on May 18 2010. The 2013 policy is an example of a policy that gives concrete factors to be aware of and of course if there is solid training that teaches officers on how to consider these factors and others, it greatly increases the likelihood of a desired outcome. The training received at the police academy is meant to provide just the minimum amount of training necessary and it is the department's responsibility to continue to train the officer on critical issues like the use of force.

My opinions are based upon my twenty four plus years of study and review of writing proper policy and procedures and my teaching and training of others on how to do the same, and my years of producing and implementing policy and procedure and providing training for employees of the Utah Attorney General office. I also have spent hundreds of hours studying case law on the factors in the use of force and training officers on those issues and what the legal standards are with respect to those issues.

IV. Conclusion

I conclude that Draper PD. Did not have a sufficient policy and procedure in place in May 2010 to meet their obligations under the constitution, to train and guide officers in the department in the proper and legal use of force. They also did not provide evidence of specific sufficient training on the proper use of force that is required to meet their obligations under the law.
